My research focused on the links between memory studies, politics and conflict management by suggesting how the intentional manipulation, if not abuse, of memory feeds into mechanisms that perpetuate social divisions brought about through violent means. Using the spaces formerly populated by ethnic Serbs in Croatia as a context for this research, I explained the role of “memory abuse” in maintaining previously non-observed or non-existent social divisions that have emerged as a result of the Homeland War/Croatian War of Independence. As well, my dissertation examined the construction of Croatian national identity through the commemorative process and the tensions that emerge between the predominant “defender”/“branitelj” narrative and those of forgotten civilian victims.
